

Mary and Doug (Mr. and Mrs. D. Fairbanks) blow in from the West to attend to business affairs connected with their movie interests and an enterprising photographer snaps the smiling bride and groom as they step off the train at Grand Central. "Our Mary" said she just had to come to New York for her trousseau.

Shipmates who survived when the U. S. transport President Lincoln was torpedoed two days out from Brest keep a rendezvous at sea on Memorial Day, the second anniversary of the tragedy, with the twenty-six members of the ship's company who went down with the vessel—one of the most impressive of all the Memorial Day services. The U. S. S. Bagaduce, a gray seagoing tug, her flag at half mast, took the hundred living heroes down off Sandy Hook, where, after a recital of the historic event by the ill-fated transport's skipper, Commander P. W. Foote, and a salute fired by blue-jackets, floral wreaths, the size and shape of life preservers, were lowered and drifted out to sea as the band played "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Left—A pictorial warning to reckless motorists that should prove more effective than the admonition of any traffic cop. The absolute wreck of a taxi after being hit by a brand new touring car up West End Avenue way recently. One chauffeur was killed and several passengers seriously injured in the "accident."

An unusual photo of a sensational aerial stunt. An English army officer makes a parachute jump from a speeding plane and the cameraman in another plane has caught him upside down before righting himself in his daring descent—a photo that clearly shows how quickly the parachutes of the air service open.

Right—The famous Zouaves of the Civil War, who attracted much attention in the Memorial Day parade on Riverside Drive. The Zouaves, in their picturesque red Turkish uniforms, marched so slowly that the crowd was able to count them all—just fifteen. Last year 500 Civil War veterans marched in the Manhattan parade—this year but 300. Scarcely one of the posts numbered more than a dozen men, and the number of autos carrying those unable to march was greater than ever.
